What's New In?

It's a measure of how hard the companies have worked to win support from lawmakers that they now succeed.

The soda industry has long argued that taxing sugary drinks won't save consumers any money, and would actually result in higher prices and lower consumption. Citing those failed efforts, industry groups have recently poured money into ad campaigns and outside lobbying in states across the country. Their tactic: convince state lawmakers to work with national politicians to undo their own state-level beverage taxes. But two of the biggest soda companies failed last year. And now, thanks to what advocates for the soda industry have dubbed “the year of the check,” the industry is facing more steep challenges.

ADVERTISEMENT The National Beverage Association (NBA) announced in July that it wouldn't make a contribution to the National Republican Campaign Committee — an arm of the Republican National Committee — following an incident in which the president tweeted a photo of himself tossing a soda can on the White House South Lawn. The tweet featured the hashtag #MySodaCan. The NBA said at the time that it appreciated Trump's enthusiasm, but argued that they chose not to contribute because the RNC was unfairly using one company's "decision to fund ads attacking one segment of American voters" to "raise money at the expense of the beverage industry." Then, in August, the Trump's administration backed a proposal from a federal judge blocking the city of San Francisco's restrictions on sugary drinks, citing the burdens on soda companies, including the NBA. None of this is stopping the industry from pouring massive amounts of money into state-level lobbying efforts across the country. While the local branches of the two biggest soda companies, PepsiCo and Coca-Cola, would hardly be recognizable if it weren't for their inclusion on the Fortune 500 list, their headquarters are in New York and New Jersey, respectively. And they are more focused on the issue in states with smaller populations. Rising Tide, a progressive group fighting for tougher nutrition standards, has noted that the two companies spent more than $1 million each last year on “digital ads” and phone calls to state lawmakers, or had employees on the ground. In some states, their expenditure is on par with their efforts for the previous three years combined. The issue in many states is close, and is likely to be decided by which party controls the state legislature in
